Not illustrated. 1903 Excerpt: . . . for instance, asks the Transcendentalist, can the sensational philosophy of Locke and his disciples give us anything approaching to a certainty of the existence of God The senses furnish no evidence of it. God is not art object of sensation. He is not seen, felt, heard, tasted or smelt. The objects of sense are material, local, incidental; God is immaterial, universal, eternal. The objects of sense are finite; but a finite God is no God; for God is infinite. Is it said that by men of old, bible men, God was seen, heard, clasped in human arms The reply is, that whatever Being was so apparent and tangible, could not have been God. To the assertion that the Being announced himself as God, --the infinite, the eternal God, --the challenge straightway is given: To whom did he say it How can it be proved that he...
