Not illustrated. 1916 Excerpt: $\cdot = F \sin (a-A) \cos 5 + f f_2$ where a and 5 are the right ascension and declination of the star, A and D those of the plate centre, and F the focal length in reseau intervals. The first term in and both terms in T_j were computed with 5-place logarithms. The second term in, which is very small, was taken from a diagram similar to that given by Hinks in Memoirs of the Royal Astronomical Society, 57, 167. The point which should be adopted as the plate centre in computing the standard coordinates is the foot of a perpendicular dropped from the optical centre of the objective upon the plane of the plate, which may be called the base. The importance of knowing its position accurately may be shown by considering three stars, on a great circle, and 20 apart. If these are photographed on a plate whose base coincides with the middle star, the two outer images will be equidistant from the middle one. But if the whole telescope is moved through x minutes of arc, along the line of the stars, thus tilting the plane of the plate by this angle, the distances of the star images from the new base will be $F \tan (20+x)$, $F \tan x$, and $F \tan (20-x)$ and the image of the central star will no longer be half way between the others, but will be displaced toward the side on which the base...
